

Factory outlet

old shops are being neglected with its glory past and inflaming stories of the people who build it, and replaced by new stores, so does mine is closing down on the date of exhibition close. For that matter,

I built a smaller space within the gallery space that will function as an old art store along with its small workshop and a tinny room to host visitors for a cup of tea and a talk. The workshop will be my studio where I'm about to keep on working over new paintings and sculptures in addition to a semi-retrospective of work that will also be available for sale. For six weeks I will be presence during the opening hours working, selling and talking. I will search the cracks that in-between the bills, for I believe it's not all about money.

Tamir Lichtenberg transforms the space of Rosenfeld Gallery into an old store consisting of a workshop and a show room. Lichtenberg will man the store during gallery hours in order to create new works, sell his merchandize, and converse with the walls. Due to the store's imminent closing, all items will be sold at half price. Additional drawings will also be sold at affordable prices, calculated according to paper weight.
